Why you might pick it

The original. Navy holds up against a grey Surrey sky better than the white banner you have now, and amber on navy is the strongest pair in the palette.

Why you might pick it

The light option that still looks like the brand. Reads as calm and established rather than loud. The phone flips to a navy band so it is still the darkest thing on the banner.

Nearest to the banner you have up now, but with the new logo and a solid green phone band instead of loose text. Cheapest to print and the easiest to keep clean-looking.

Why you might pick it

This is the one that shouts. Yellow-on-black is what road signs use because it is the most visible pair the eye has. Least "premium" of the six and it uses amber as the whole field rather than an accent.

E • Website hero gradient (teal to green)

Why you might pick it

Literally the gradient across the top of your homepage. Somebody who sees the banner and then lands on the site gets the same picture twice.

Subjects	#FFFFFF	☐
Phone band	#0B3D57 on #FDC64D

F • Website hero gradient, dark type and a white band

Why you might pick it

Same hero gradient as E, but the subjects are in near-black and the phone sits in a white band, the way the white cards sit on the green section of the website. Quieter than E and more designed.

Why you might pick it

The modern one. Near-black with the bright green off the dark side of the palette, and the phone in green rather than amber. Looks more tech-tutoring than neighbourhood-tutoring - your call whether that is the right signal in Surrey.
